Friend to all: Naoero builds strong international partnerships for its future

President David Adeang used September's address to the United Nations General Assembly to commit to building stronger relationships around the world while creating new opportunities at home, declaring Naoero a "friend to all and an enemy to none".

Naoero welcomes strong international partnerships

He told the assembly that while the government continued to strengthen and diversify the economy, international partnerships play an important role in attracting investment, improving infrastructure and connectivity, and creating new opportunities for dei-Naoero.

However, he also said that small states are increasingly being asked to "choose between partners, between blocs, between competing visions of the world," stating categorically, "Naoero will not be made to choose."

"We will work with every partner who respects our sovereignty and our right to decide our own future," he said, while clarifying that this position was not neutrality but independence.

Pointing out that "partnership does not mean agreement on everything," President Adeang said Naoero would remain open to working with partners around the world.

"Naoero's partnerships are not all of one kind.

"Some are born of kinship, some of shared interests, some have been built through decades of cooperation, and some are grounded in the conviction that when a wrong persists it must be named and addressed."

He reminded his audience that each relationship matters.

"None is a substitute for another, and none comes at the expense of another."

Alongside these relationships, President Adeang affirmed the government's commitment to continue prioritising the economy, and updated world leaders with the significant advances Naoero has seen in recent years, including the Naoero Trust Fund, fisheries, the seabed, joining the Egmont Group, new revenue through the Naoero investment and residence programmes, and a virtual asset regulator built with full due diligence obligations before the industry it regulates.

"And behind all of it, investment in health, education and sport, so that our people are not only better off but healthier and better prepared," he said.

The President called on the international community to continue to "invest in our people, invest in an economy that rests on more than a handful of arrangements, invest in institutions that will outlast my government and the next, invest in the infrastructure, connectivity and opportunities that distance has too often denied us."

He said Naoero offered "not dependence, but participation; not expectation, but contribution; not a beneficiary, but a partner."

For dei-Naoero, stronger international partnerships mean greater opportunities at home while ensuring decisions about the nation's future remain firmly in Naoero's hands.

President Adeang also underscored the restoration of Naoero as the country's official name. "Anga dei-Naoero. I am from Naoero," President Adeang said.

"We take our seat under that name proud of where we have come from. Confident in who we are. And determined to carry our name into the future."

He says the choice was not made to erase the past but to honour it with respect for Naoero's history and gratitude for the journey 'Nauru' has led to independence and place on the international stage. //

Naoero Intergenerational Trust Fund

As previously reported in the Naoero Bulletin edition 15, the Naoero Intergenerational Trust Fund has amassed over $500 million in the first 10 years since its inception.

President David Adeang presented his ministerial statement at the 17 September Parliament sitting highlighting “the extraordinary national achievement”.

“It is a defining moment in our journey towards economic security, national resilience, and a better future for every dei-Naoero.”

The President said the journey began ten years ago with the vision of breaking the cycle of short-term economic dependence and build something lasting, that would continue to protect the people of Naoero long after the current administration has completed its service to the nation.

“We wanted to create a national legacy that would belong not only to the people of today but also to our children, our grandchildren and generations of dei-Naoero yet to be born.”

The powerful reality of reaching $500 million in the first decade demonstrates what Naoero can accomplish when “we act with courage, discipline, foresight and unity”.

The fund represents a national promise, learning from past economic challenges, and to manage today’s resources responsibly.

“It is a promise that the prosperity we created will be shared across generations.”

During the presentation of the NTF’s progress in September, President Adeang spoke directly to the Naoero Secondary School students in attendance reminding them that while the Fund was established for them, it alone cannot secure their future, and while it creates opportunities cannot replace knowledge, discipline, integrity and hard work.

He urged the students to take education seriously, look after their physical and mental health, and prepare to take on roles as teachers, doctors, nurses, engineers, entrepreneurs, public servants and national leaders, for the future of Naoero.

“Your future is worth protecting, but it is your responsibility to build it,” the President said to the students.

At the current pace of the fund, it is estimated to reach $1 billion by its maturity stage in 2035.

President Adeang acknowledged the support and confidence of Naoero’s partners and team of service providers and committed support staff for their contributions and partnership in the establishment and growth of the Fund. //

Minister Scotty updates PIF55

Minister Charmaine Scotty presented her statement on the 55th Pacific Islands Forum leaders' meeting in Palau in August.

Naoero highlights stance on pivoting to self-driven economic initiatives

Minister Scotty represented His Excellency President David Adeang at the regional summit. She was later joined by the President and deputy ministers Rennier Gadabu, Isabella Dageago, and Wanganeen Emiu.

Together, the Naoero delegation engaged in crucial bilateral discussions with various dialogue partners on the margins of the leaders meeting to advance Naoero's national interests, economic partnerships, and diplomatic relations.

In her address as the President's Special Envoy, Minister Scotty expressed Naoero's sincere gratitude to the Forum for recognising and adopting the country's traditional name.

"It affirms our heritage, our identity, and our right to speak to the world in our own voice."

Minister Scotty said while aid remains important during crises, charity cannot serve as the region's permanent development model.

"The Forum must lead a decisive transition toward strategic commerce, targeted investment, trade, and sustainable national revenue.

The key highlights of Naoero's economic stance delivered at the Forum include: transitioning from dependency to commerce and pivoting toward self-driven economic initiatives; and the UN's Multidimensional Vulnerability Index (MVI), reaffirming that gross national income alone does not reflect true vulnerability.

The Forum communique explicitly calls for stronger recognition of the UN MVI by international financial institutions.

Minister Scotty reaffirmed Naoero's foundational foreign policy, friend to all and enemy to none, stressing that nations should not be pulled from side to side by geopolitics, but instead unite around the security, dignity, and economic future of our own people.

She also highlighted achievements under the peace and security portfolio which align with core priorities set out in joint communiques such as the Boe Declaration and cybersecurity; the Waqa Moana Concept; and the Joint Heads of Pacific Security framework to combat transnational crime.

In line with Naoero's national policy, Minister Scotty said the Republic disassociated itself from paragraph 29 of the communique regarding intercontinental ballistic missile (ICBM) testing.

As a key speaker and active driver of gender-based violence prevention, Minister Scotty said it was a personal honour and privilege to speak directly to these critical issues during the leaders' deliberations.

She called for the urgent need for regional solidarity and dedicated resources to combat gender-based violence. As a result of these direct deliberations, leaders endorsed the 5th Pacific Islands Forum Women Leaders meeting.

Consequently, the communique included a landmark outcome addressing financing for GBV prevention, national and budgetary commitments, and climate and green finance integration.

In her address to PIF leaders in Palau, Minister Scotty urged leaders to move from declarations to implementation and tangible outcomes that our people can see and feel, adding that Naoero will continue to play an active, constructive, and principled role in shaping and moving towards a self-reliant, secure, and prosperous Blue Pacific. //

(seated 2nd from right) Minister Thoma says conference theme is deeply relevant to Naoero

The regional meeting of water ministers in September brought together decision-makers, development partners and experts from across the Pacific to advance collaboration, innovation, and strengthen governance that support sustainable delivery of water and wastewater services for Pacific communities.

Minister for Climate Change and National Resilience, Delvin Thoma reaffirmed Naoero's strong support for outcomes that recognise the particular challenges of small island states, during the 10th Pacific Water and Wastewater ministers meeting in Pape'ete, French Polynesia.

Minister Thoma says the theme, Living water - From Source to Reef, Water Shaping Life in the Pacific Islands, is deeply relevant to Naoero.

"Across our region, water is central to health, livelihoods and the resilience of our communities. For small island states such as ours, water security is not an abstract policy issue. It is a daily concern for households, schools, health services and national development." Naoero's circumstances are distinctive owing to its geology and very limited freshwater resources.

"Rainwater remains our main natural source of water. However, it cannot always meet national demand, particularly during dry period. As a result, we rely heavily on desalination to provide safe drinking water for our people," Minister Thoma said.

Infrastructure upgrades such as additional water delivery trucks and the new ADB-supported Nauru Sustainable and Resilient Urban Development Project (NSRUD) are important gains in addressing water reticulation, wastewater and sanitation management.

The NSRUD will be the country's first water reticulation system, and is expected to serve around 1,200 households, approximately 55 per cent of the population.

But the minister says infrastructure alone is not enough, and calls for continued partnerships, training and financing to support these actions.

While desalination is essential for Naoero, it is costly to run and depends on reliable equipment, regular maintenance and skill staff. Any break in that supported system will be felt quickly by the community.

"This is why water security must be approached as a whole system from capturing and storing rainwater, to conserving water and maintaining reliable desalination services."

He urges that Pacific countries continue to cooperate and learn from each other given they face the same challenges.

Ministers concluded the meeting, 1 September, and endorsed the Pape'ete Declaration on regional commitments and action towards a water-secure and climate-resilient Pacific. //

Naoero's virtual authority closes in on launch

Building a trusted, internationally recognised virtual assets regulatory framework remains a key priority for Naoero as the government continues to strengthen the nation's economy through innovation and responsible regulation.

Zameer and Nygryn bring value to virtual assets authority

Earlier this year the Command Ridge Virtual Asset Authority (CRVAA) took steps to strengthen its executive leadership with two key appointments.

Internationally recognised financial risk leader Maria Zameer joined as chief risk and compliance officer while cybersecurity and technology specialist River Nygryn came on board as chief technology officer.

President David Adeang said attracting world-class international expertise demonstrated growing confidence in Naoero's vision to become a trusted leader in digital innovation and economic diversification.

"While we don't have the same resources of larger nations, we are embracing innovation and building a more resilient and prosperous nation for dei-Naoero.

"At the same time as building a higher standard of living, we are prioritising international best practices and the highest levels of governance and compliance," the President said.

CRVAA chief executive officer Brian Phelps said the appointments ensured the authority was well placed to commence operations and deliver a world-class regulatory framework.

"Our executive capability is being strengthened as we develop the regulator and bring the right experience to meet international regulatory standards while supporting responsible innovation and creating long-term economic opportunities for Naoero," he said.

Ms Zameer has more than 20 years of international experience in financial services, risk management and digital assets, joining CRVAA from Standard Chartered Bank, where she most recently served as head of digital assets risk in Singapore. Throughout her career, she has developed and led complex risk management frameworks supporting the safe and responsible growth of digital assets.

Ms Nygryn joined CRVAA after more than 17 years' experience across technology, cybersecurity and risk in banking, financial services and the virtual assets sector. She has led major technology and security programs for some of Australia's largest financial institutions and brings extensive expertise in cybersecurity, artificial intelligence and digital innovation.

The appointments marked another milestone as the government continues implementing its vision to position Naoero as a trusted, internationally recognised digital assets jurisdiction, supporting economic diversification, attracting global investment and creating new opportunities for future generations. //
